Being Bilingual Actually Makes You Smarter

Learning a new language is far from just being a way to meet new people: it's also healthy exercise for your brain. Several studies, in fact, have found that bilingualism can have a marked effect on your cognitive abilities.

Learning a second language improves the brain's executive function — the cognitive system involved in multitasking, problem-solving and other mental challenges. The brain benefits when you learn Spanish or any other language because you become better able to edit out irrelevant information, and focus on what's important.

In a recent study at the University of California, San Diego, scientists discovered that elderly Spanish-English bilinguals – people with a high degree of bilingualism – were more resistant to the onset of Alzheimer's and similar diseases.
